Financial State of Denver, CO

Despite receiving support from COVID relief grants and other federal programs, Denver remained in bad fiscal shape during the onset of the pandemic. Based upon the city’s fiscal year 2020 audited financial report, Denver had a Taxpayer Burden™ of $4,700, earning it a “C” grade from Truth in Accounting.

Denver’s elected officials have repeatedly made financial decisions that left the city with a debt burden of $1.3 billion. That burden came to $4,700 for every city taxpayer. Denver’s financial problems stem mostly from unfunded retirement obligations that have accumulated over the years. The city had set aside only 71 cents for every dollar of promised pension benefits and 24 cents for every dollar of promised retiree health care benefits.

Denver did not have enough money set aside to weather the pandemic and the city has been in poor fiscal shape for years. Like all other cities, Denver received federal assistance from the CARES Act and other COVID-19 related grants which came with stipulations on how the money could be spent. Also, the city has not been properly funding its pension and retiree health care promises which places a burden on future taxpayers.

The data included in this report is derived from the city of Denver’s 2020 audited Annual Comprehensive Financial Report and retirement plans’ reports. To compare prior years and other city financial, demographic, and economic information go to Data-Z.org.
