Oklahoma City Finances Improved Prior to Pandemic

January 2021

truthinaccounting.org | data-z.org

Financial State of Oklahoma City, Oklahoma

Going into the coronavirus pandemic, Oklahoma City had some resources set aside. Based upon the city’s fiscal year 2019 audited financial report, Oklahoma City had a Taxpayer Surplus™ of $400, earning it a “B” grade from Truth in Accounting. As a result of the current pandemic, Oklahoma City is expected to lose some revenue.

Unlike most cities before the crisis, Oklahoma City had more than enough resources available, $61.2 million, to pay all of its bills, including public employees’ retirement benefits. This means that Oklahoma City’s elected officials have truly balanced their budgets. When broken down, the amount available to pay future bills resulted in a surplus of $400 for each Oklahoma City taxpayer.

The surplus Oklahoma City had will help the city to weather the current pandemic and downturns in the market, which can cause the value of a government’s assets to fluctuate. But the uncertainty surrounding this crisis makes it impossible to determine how much will be needed to maintain government services and benefits.

The data included in this report is derived from Oklahoma City’s 2019 audited Comprehensive Annual Financial Report and retirement plans’ reports. To compare cities’ financial information go to data-z.org.

Oklahoma City Financial Breakdown

Fast Facts

- Oklahoma City had $1.75 billion available to pay $1.69 billion worth of bills.
- The outcome was a $61.2 million surplus, which breaks down to $400 per taxpayer.
- Oklahoma City’s financial position improved from the previous fiscal year mostly because the city’s revenue exceeded its expenses and the firefighters’ pension liability decreased by $69 million. The city is now a Sunshine City.
