THE FINANCIAL STATE OF FORT WORTH

Truth in Accounting's (TIA) new city report ranks and grades the 75 most populous cities in the United States by their financial health. Fort Worth ranks No. 62, earning it a "D" on TIA's grading scale.

Repeated decisions by city officials have left the city with a staggering debt burden of $3.2 billion, according to TIA's analysis of its 2016 financial filings. That burden equates to $13,300 for every Fort Worth taxpayer.

Fort Worth's financial problems are largely driven by entitlement obligations in two categories: pensions and retiree healthcare benefits. The city has $3.2 billion in unfunded pension promises and $684.2 million in unfunded retiree healthcare benefits. While Fort Worth has promised these benefits, little money has been set aside to fund them.

These statistics are jarring, but what's also alarming is that city government officials continue to hide significant amounts of retirement debt from their balance sheets, despite new rules to increase financial transparency. This skewed financial data gives residents a false impression of their city's overall financial health.

FORT WORTH FINANCIAL BREAKDOWN

FAST FACTS

- + Fort Worth has $1.5 billion available in assets to pay $4.7 billion worth of bills.
- + The outcome is a $3.2 billion shortfall and a $13,300 Taxpayer Burden™.
- + Because the city uses outdated pension data, more than $1 billion of its pension liabilities are not reported on its balance sheet. Furthermore, nearly $116 million of retiree healthcare obligations are also excluded.
